Abandoned Places!

Uptown Theatre is a massive, ornate movie palace located in the Uptown neighborhood of Chicago. Constructed in 1925, it is the largest in Chicago, it boasts 4,381 seats and its interior is said to be larger than any other movie palace in the U.S., including Radio City Music Hall in New York. Rehabilitation efforts are needed to restore and reopen this historic Chicago landmark, which has been closed since 1981. The theater opened with a staff of over 130, including a full-time 34 piece orchestra. Elaborate stage show productions would accompany each movie. The theater is on several landmark and historic registers. Movies at the Uptown continued even after stage shows ended. The stage shows were revived for a short time and movies continued during the 1950s and 60s. In the 1970s, the theater was revived as a major concert venue hosting local and national acts, notably the Grateful Dead. When it closed in 1981 the owner turned off the heat and a frozen pipe burst causing extensive damage to the interior. In subsequent years, deferred maintenance and vandalism have led to further deterioration of the structure. In 2006 the exterior was extensively secured and terra cotta pieces were cataloged and stored for future restoration efforts. It was purchased through a judicial sale in 2008 by JAM Productions for $3.2 million. In 2013 the fourth installment of the Transformers series had begun filming scenes in the theater. A diverse advocacy group of friends, neighbors, historians, and theatre enthusiasts supports restoring the venue to its position as an entertainment and economic asset for the Uptown neighborhood.
