Roll lemons on a flat surface to easily get twice as much juice out or microwave on high for 15 seconds. Then cut a slit in the lemon instead of cutting it in half. It allows you to squeeze out only what you need. You can then store the lemon in the fridge without a bag.

Abandoned Places!

Abandoned in the woods near Bloomington, Indiana stands IU's Knightridge Space Observatory. The observatory once housed a fairly large telescope. Though the structure is now in a fairly built up area, when it was built between 1936-1937, it was in a very remote spot. The squat building consists of just two rooms, one on the ground floor and an upper room where the crude, four-ton telescope could look out of the retractable viewing slot built into the domed ceiling. While the outer wall is made of sturdy brick, the interior construction and the dome were built from wood. The dome was placed on a track with rollers that allowed the entire ceiling to rotate in order to find the best viewing angles. The facility was simple but effective for early 20th century astronomers. The area of Bloomington continued to grow over the years and eventually grew close enough to the station that its delicate viewing instruments were no longer effective. This, combined with a growing obsolescence, led to the observatory's eventual abandonment. Sometime in the 1960's the building was stripped of its telescopes and mounts. They were shipped to New Jersey for installation in the Paul Robinson Observatory. Based on published statistics, this must have been quite a task as the hardware was seven foot in diameter and weighed over 8,000 pounds.
